I am emotional because I have heard all the news about our incredible youth that is challenging the challenging action on climate change by political leaders around the world. I listened to Greta Thunberg with passionate speeches and interviews, including today's speech at the United Nations. I read of American Alexandria Villaseñor, who at 14 years is one of the youngest organizers of the global climate strike. And I look at interviews with Xiutezcatl Martínez, one of the young people who denounce our federal government to Juliana against the United States of America. In light of all this, I cannot tell you how excited I am to share this new book of Charlesbridge! This post contains affiliate links. Mario and the Hole in the Sky: As a chemist saved our planet from Elizabeth Rusch is the biography of Dr. Mario José Molina, the researcher who discovered the horrible effects of CFCs on the protective ozone layer of our planet. The book begins with Mario's childhood and how he was interested in science. It highlights the support of his family of interests, and then follows his journey to higher education eventually earn his doctorate. And then the story focuses on his research of chlorofluorocarbons (CFC) and his discovery of the damages that were causing our atmosphere. He talks about his struggle to let the world know the danger and what it took for people to believe him at last. And he speaks of his new concern - global warming - and how he has hope because he has already lived through the first environmental crisis and seen how universal action can happen and make solutions work. This impressive book goes further to help extend learning because it also has additional pages included to help children, including: an epilogue in the back of the book, a section listing things kids (and families!) can do today to use less energy and release less greenhouse gas into the atmosphere, another section from the author dedicated to the research process, and a timeline inside the back cover! I mean, really. This book is such a treasure for families and schools! And I love that it highlights such an important figure in our world history: A Mexican American chemist. Elizabeth Rusch is a science writer who loves telling important, overlooked stories. She does a great job with this book. And the illustrator, Teresa Martiñez, is a Mexican artist. Her artwork in this book is very engaging for children. (It actually reminds me of early Disney movies - beautifully hand-drawn.) The illustrations make science come alive - chemistry at that! How hard is that for an artist? And you know what the best part is? It's available in BOTH ENGLISH AND SPANISH! (See below.) I love this book so much that I've created a free download with some easy comprehension questions for you to ask your child/student after they have finished reading the story. Yes, they are in English and Spanish so you can choose which one best suits your needs. CLICK HERE TO DOWNLOAD You can find these fabulous books (English and Spanish) on Amazon: Amazon:
